Adaptive Capacity. Strategic Resilience.

Achieving a thriving future is more difficult than it appears in this day and age. Gone are assumptions that long-standing companies will remain successful, replaced by realities of market turbulence and change. Among the factors fueling this turbulence are disruptive innovation, industry redefinitions, swarms of international competitors, and geopolitical—as well as natural—shocks.

Organizational resilience, or the capacity for adaptation and continuous reinvention, is the new energy and context for leaders and their organizations. To achieve true strategic resilience, executives, teams, and employees must develop an expanded, adaptive capacity in how they work. Facilitating a deeper understanding, the know-how for spirited innovation, and a clear pathway for movement is the directive of the future.

Organizational resilience, or the capacity for adaptation and continuous reinvention, is the new energy and context for leaders and their organizations.

Organizations can realize their full capacities today, while expanding potential for the future. It takes context, integration, and power rather than force. Avastone Consulting delivers executive, leadership, and organizational development services to Fortune 500 and other complex global organizations aspiring for greater heights—and sustainable performance.

Imagine the possibility of deeply committed employees, performing magnificently, vigorously connected to others within and outside the organization. By illuminating realities and the wealth of possibilities, we enable our clients to realize the true potential of the organization and the human system at work.

Widening the Lens.

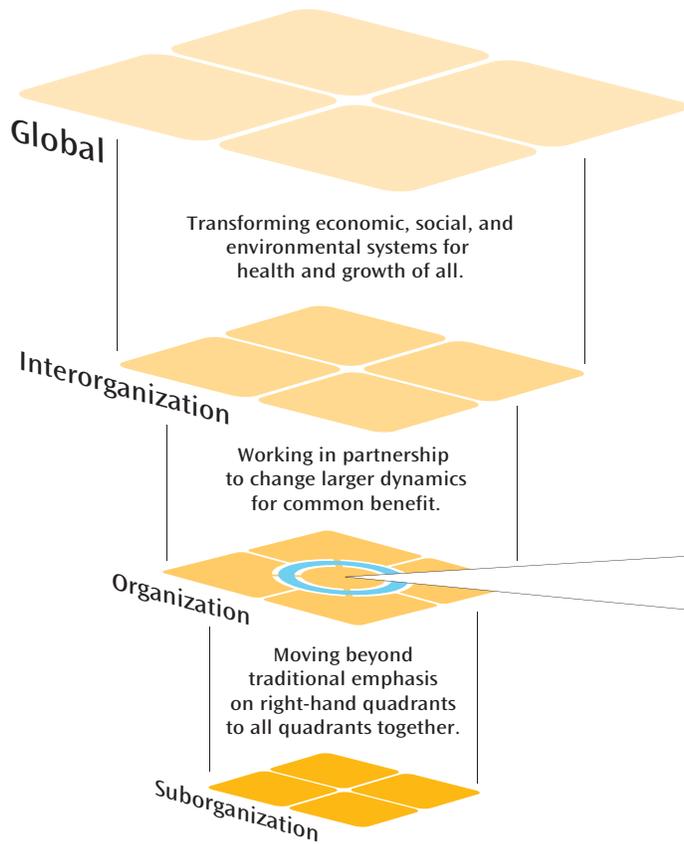

Whether you are developing leaders, reaching for the next level of performance, orchestrating large-scale change, or growing new segments of the business, how you frame the challenge impacts your solution set and results.

Avastone offers a sophisticated means to frame and understand what is really going on. Drawing on integral theory and a whole-systems' change perspective, we bring clarity to complexity and alignment to fragmentation. Our approach recognizes and sidesteps limited starting points that result in partial solutions.

Many developmental programs are designed by advocates of a particular concept or theory and employ a singular learning process. Many showcase the same technologies and experts. But “one-size-fits-all” development models ignore the nuances of each organization, preclude a comprehensive and objective approach, and too often fall short on results.

Avastone takes the time to learn exactly what your company is up against, both from an outside-in perspective and an inside-out perspective—throughout the human system and beyond.

Our framework anchors your issues within their wider context so that you can see the complete picture. Ours is not a new model to follow or a theory to believe in, but instead a comprehensive and integrated way to characterize and understand your situation, and to connect information and perspectives.

Integrating Perspective.

The integrated framework we draw upon incorporates organization, interorganizational, and larger, global, whole-systems' perspectives. The framework used depends upon the scope of concern needing attention and includes four quadrants of emphasis: interior and exterior from both individual and collective viewpoints.

Companies have traditionally placed most emphasis on the exterior dimensions (the tangible, visible, right-hand quadrants), which include an individual's behavior, his or her performance, skills and competencies on an individual level, as well as the organization's overall processes, technology, and systems on a collective level.

What is not generally recognized is that if the interior intangible dimensions (the left-hand side) aren't integrated with as much vigor, care, and attention, then the organization's performance and success are compromised.

People's individual experience, motivations and mind-sets—as well as the company's culture and meaning-making realities—have critical impact on the bottom line. A vital organization can exist only when all four quadrants are coherently addressed, aligned, and mutually reinforced.

Integration of the four quadrants establishes the cornerstones for resilience and vitality. No matter what the strategic imperative, this integral view brings clarity to complexity and offers clear footholds for dealing with turbulent conditions. It generates mutually-reinforcing solutions that optimize initiatives to affect the greatest positive impact with the least effort and expenditure.
